

Our daughter was diagnosed with a life threatening health problem close to the time of Sandi's diagnosis. Although we didn't know each other well, when our paths crossed – on and off campus – over the next year we spoke of health and illness, life and death, and how to manage the complicated space between. She brought strength and even a little humor to those conversations, and through her insights and empathy she met me where I was when I needed it most. It is clear to me that this is the kind of person Sandi was and that I was one of many lives she touched.

— Kirstin N. Sterner, Ph.D., Assistant Professor, Department of Anthropology, University of Oregon